Tourism in the Least Developed Countries | World Tourism Organization

Tourism is a rapidly growing phenomenon and has become one of the largest industries in the world. Multiplier effects from tourism are significant and the impact of the industry is increasingly being recognized as an important contributor to national economies.

Tourism to less developed countries: the social consequences.

The social consequences of tourism in less developed countries, especially in LDCs, have considerable potential for both positive and negative impact. The extent of this impact is contingent on a range of factors and the power dynamics that exist between tourism industry operators and host country nationals (HCNs).

The significance of tourism in less developed countries continues to be a matter of contention as many nations seek to expand their industries in pursuit of economic rewards, but become vulnerable to adverse impacts while doing so.
